A daily guide to cruise activities

Sunrise 6:44am • Sunset 6:45pm • Tonight's Dress: Formal

How The Waters Were Named

The names of most bodies of water are obvious, the great majority deriving from a physical characteristic, the name of a discoverer, or a place nearby, etc. But here are a good number that aren't so easy to figure.

Atlantic Ocean - The Atlantic takes its name either from the lost kingdom of Atlantis or more probably from the Atlas Mountains in northwest Africa, which the ancients believed overlooked the entire ocean.

Mediterranean - Deriving from the Latin "medius", middle and "terra", earth, Mediterranean means "the sea in the middle of the earth", which indeed the ancients believed it to be.

Pacific Ocean - Named by Portuguese navigator, Fernando de Magallanes, better known to the world as Magellan, on his voyage to the New World in 1520. Magellan had to deal with gales and bad weather (not to mention hunger and mutiny) while sailing in the Atlantic, and when he entered the Pacific he found that the great body of water was placid for days of sailing. He named it El Pacifico "the peaceful one" not knowing that it covered one third of the earth's surface and gave birth to terrible storms and waves unequaled in any other body of water.
